TALKING POINTS:

Not What It Seems

• This initiative claims to be about stopping special interest money in politics, but instead it’s a trick to deceive voters into passing a law that would benefit wealthy corporate interests at the expense of middle-class workers and their unions.

• This initiative creates a big loophole that allows corporations to continue to make political contributions without restrictions. Limiting workers and unions only gives corporations more power to spend as much as they want on lobbyists to influence politicians.

Singles Out Middle-Class Workers for Unfair Treatment

• Big corporations and their high-paid lobbyists are scapegoating teachers, nurses, firefighters and other union workers to distract from the fact that middle-class Californians are struggling while large corporations are making record profits, getting richer and getting large tax breaks.

• This is an attack on the middle class and attempts to silence the voices of teachers who fight for smaller class size, firefighters who fight to shorten emergency response times, and nurses who fight for safe patient staffing ratios in hospitals.
